Mashable defines social media marketing as the process of getting website traffic or attention through social media sites. A corporate message spread from user to user and presumably resonates because it appears to come from a trusted, third-party source, unlike the brand or company itself. Mashable writes on its website. Therefore, this form of marketing is driven by word-of-mouth, meaning it leads to earned media rather than paid media. One of the reasons consumers have taken on social media marketing is that it not only gives them a chance to learn more about businesses, it also allows them to communicate with them. Social media marketing opens up a two-way street for consumers to ask questions, express complaints and share positive feedback in a way that other marketing doesn't cater. This open form of communication gives businesses the chance to show consumers they are listening to what they have to say and taking their opinions seriously. One of the reasons why this type of marketing has become so popular with companies is that it doesn't cost a lot to get started. Getting started with social media marketing is very easy and something anyone can do. While you'll get better results if you do research to train yourself on the tactics of social media marketing, interacting with people is a skill most born with. The first step in creating social media marketing plan is to determine the social networks that are worth being active on. With so many social networks out there, businesses need to focus on the ones where they know clients. It's important to measure your customers on the social networks they use most not to waste time on websites that consumers don't pay attention to. Some of the most popular social networks for social media today are Facebook, Twitter, Instagram, Pinterest, LinkedIn and Google+. To start social media marketing campaigns, all companies need to sign up for free with every social network they want to use. Once registered, businesses can create individual profiles for their business and immediately start posting content, such as industrial trends, company news, and promotional information. Once a business has created profiles on each site, it's important that they define the goals they're trying to achieve. Do they want to use social media marketing to sell a certain product, create buzz about the company in general, or drive more consumers to their website? Knowing the purpose of the plan, it will be easier to determine the type of strategy and content to be used. Another main component of any social media marketing plan is to figure out how to attract fans, friends or followers. One quick way to do this is by typing in the current customer base. Encouraging current customers to friend or follow together in exchange for a coupon or free gift is an easy to start building a following. Once current customers are in the mix, they will ideally begin to share the posted content with their friends and family, who will then in turn start following through as well. In addition to content, businesses need to decide whether they want customer support to be part of their social media strategy. If it is, they need to keep constant tabs on their social media pages so they can respond to customer questions and complaints. Not responding will only make companies lose credibility in the eyes of those whose business they are trying to attract. Besides posting their own content and responding to questions and complaints, an organization needs to make customer engagement an important part of their social media strategy. Ask them questions about what they like and don't like about the brand. It's a tremendous source of information that shouldn't go untapped. Since many small business owners don't have the time or the insight on how to best create social media marketing plans, they hire outside services to do it for them. Social media marketing companies can not only use every platform for the benefit of a company, but they can also teach owners and other employees how to manage the content that goes on each site and how to evaluate where their views come from. When choosing a social media marketing service, businesses should look for those who have solid reputation and experience, as well as those who are well versed not only in the major social networks, but those new to the scene. Among the other sites they need to be experienced with include Blogger, YouTube, Reddit, Wikis and Stumbleupon. Businesses also want a social media company that can provide monthly reports showing which social marketing campaigns get the most hits. A good social networking company will tell you what they're doing and how they do it, while the best companies will continue to be active to make sure your business is noticed on the Web. To helping small businesses choose the right service. Business News Daily's sister site, Business.com conducted extensive in-depth reviews from social media marketing companies.
